Writing a Norse Saga

You have been selected to journey with the Vikings as they explore and settle remote lands. Your job was to chronicle the journey in story form to show the bravery and heroic accomplishments of the main Viking captain. Your position on the journey is up to you. (Ex might be the wife of the captain.)

Prewriting – you will need to read the packet on the Vikings that is located in the classroom. Take notes on the types of ships they used, the daily lives of the women and men, how their village was arranged, their religion, and where and why they explored to give your saga realism.

The following words also must be included in context form in your story – fjords, jarls, berserkers, Eddas, runes. These should be underlined in read in your final draft.

Your saga must be either:
1. At least a typed page in an old manuscript font, 12 point, normal margins
2. Written in black ink on notebook paper single-spaced and a minimum of 2 pages of normal size handwriting.

Design the cover of your saga with the Rune Stones handout on which you write the title of your story in Viking Alphabet. Use the handout as a practice page and create the final on a piece of typing paper.

Place your name and period on the left hand corner of your finished saga. You will read this to the class on the day of the completion of the task.
Rune stones

The letters of the Viking alphabet are called runes. Runes were often carved into stones as a memorial to a person or a special event.
Write a message on the rune stone below.

http://www.bbc.co.uk/schools/vikings/activities/ws_rune.shtml
Why It's Important  During the 900s, Charlemagne’s empire and Anglo-Saxon England were attacked by new invaders known as Norseman, or Vikings (vî’ kîngz). They came from the far northern part of Europe now called Scandinavia (skan’ duh nâ’ vî uh). They spread fear and destruction throughout western Europe. However, they opened up new trade routes and taught seafaring skills to other Europeans.

The Vikings captured parts of Britain and France. They ruled cities in Russia and set up colonies on islands in the North Atlantic. They even traveled to North America. Those who went abroad married the people they conquered and accepted a new religion and new customs. Others stayed in Scandinavia and set up the kingdoms of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark.

SECTION 1  The Land

The Viking homeland of Scandinavia was an area made up mostly of forests and long, rugged coastlines. The southern part, known as Jutland (juh’ tuhn), or Denmark, had many natural harbors and was well suited for farming. It had large plains where the Vikings grew grains and pastured their cattle, sheep, and pigs.

The rest of Scandinavia was not as well suited to farming. The soil was rocky, and the growing season was short. The coastline, however, had many fjords (le’ yordz’), or narrow bays. Because of this, the people turned to the sea to make a living.

SECTION 2  Daily Life

Family life was important to the Vikings. Most households had 20 to 30 members, including parents, grandparents, married children, and grandchildren. Families often fought bloody feuds to defend their honor. The payment of fines later ended such feuds.

The People  Viking warriors were called berserkers (ber zerk’ erz). They believed in a life of action and valued deeds that called for strength and courage. They fought to gain wealth, honor, and fame. They believed that a Viking for war brought special honors from the gods.

To call their warriors to battle, the Vikings lit bonfires on the tops of mountains. Those who saw a fire would light a new one to spread the message. Warriors fought with battle axes, swords, and spears. Metal helmets decorated with animal figures covered their heads. Shirts made of iron rings and covered by a large cloth protected their bodies. Warriors preferred to die by their own hand rather than give their enemies the satisfaction of capturing or killing them.

The women encouraged their men to fight. A Viking always bought his wife from her family on their wedding day. If he was not pleased with her, he could sell her. Yet, the position of Viking women was quite high. They took complete charge of the home. They could attend public meetings and talk with men other than their husbands. They could own property and get a divorce. Many Viking women grew herbs that were used as medicine.

Both men and women liked fine clothes. Men usually dressed in trousers and woolen shirts covered by knee-length tunics. Broad leather belts held the clothing in place. Sheepskin bands and caps kept their heads warm. For special events, men wore red cloaks with brooches and carried decorated swords and daggers. Women also wore tunics held in place by a belt. They covered their heads with woolen or linen caps and wore large brooches, pins, and bracelets. Both men and women wore their hair long. The men took great pride in their mustaches and beards. Calling Viking man “beardless” was an insult that could be wiped out only by death.

The Vikings had no schools. Girls were taught household skills, such as spinning, weaving, and sewing, by their mothers. Boys were taught to use the bow and arrow and to be good fighters by their fathers. Boys also memorized tales of heroes and gods and competed in games that tested their strength and endurance.

Raiders

The Vikings worshiped many gods that at first were similar to the Germanic gods. Over time, they changed their gods to suit the hard life of Scandinavia. The Vikings believed that the gods were responsible for the weather and for the growth of crops. Since the gods liked to hunt, fish, and play tricks on one another, the Vikings viewed them as extra-powerful humans.

The Vikings bargained with their gods to get what they wanted. Priests offered sacrifices of crops and animals for the whole village. Most Vikings also had small shrines in their homes where they could pray or offer sacrifices.

The Vikings were proud of their gods and told stories of the gods’ great deeds. These stories later became written poems called Eddas (ed’ uhz). The Vikings also made up sags (sah’ guhz), or long tales. At first, storytellers used to recite them at special feasts. One such tale took 12 days to recite. After 1100, the Vikings wrote down their sagas. With the coming of Christianity, however, the people lost interest in them. Many were forgotten or were forbidden by the Church. Only the people on the isolated island of Iceland passed on the old tales.

Early on, the Vikings spoke a language similar to that of the Germans. In time, the one language developed into four—Danish, Norwegian (nor’ vuhn), Swedish, and Icelandic. These languages were written with letters called runes (ruhnz), which few people except priests could understand. The Vikings used the runes as magic charms. They wrote the runes in metal and carved them in bone in the hope that they would bring good luck. When the Vikings accepted Christianity, they began to write their languages with Roman letters.

SECTION 3 Raiders and Adventurers

Scandinavia’s population kept increasing. By the end of the 800s, many Viking villages were overcrowded, and there was not enough food for everyone. Since there was no central government, the kings constantly fought one another and made life difficult for their enemies. Before long, many Viking warriors began to seek their fortunes in other lands. They set sail on their long, deckless ships that were propelled through the water with oars. On them, the Vikings could sail all the way across the Atlantic Ocean or to the shallow waters of Europe.

From East Europe to North America

Viking adventurers traveled to and raided areas from east Europe to North America. Swedish Vikings crossed the Baltic Sea and traveled down the rivers toward what is now Belarus, Ukraine, and Russia. They established trade routes from the Baltic to the Black Sea and on to the wealthy city of Byzantium (by zan’ tuh). This water route became known as the Varangian (vah rahn’ e uhn) Route. In 862, a Swedish chief named Olof (oh’ lof) founded a Viking settlement that became the Kievan Rus state.

Norwegian Vikings set up trading towns in Ireland, explored the North Atlantic, and founded a colony on Iceland. Led by an adventurer named Erik the Red, they founded a colony on the island of Greenland in 986. Then, Erik’s son, Leif Erickson (lef er’ ihk suhn), landed on the northeast coast of North America. He and his followers named the spot where they landed Vinland because of the wild grapes they found growing there. Today, the area is called Newfoundland (no’ tuhn nuhnd). The Vikings did not set up a colony in Vinland because it was far away from home and because they were repeatedly attacked by Native Americans.

Most Viking adventurers, however, went to western and southern Europe in search of food and valuables. They disguised their ships to look like wooded islands, covering them with tree branches. Then they traveled far up the rivers to make surprise attacks. They stole goods, destroyed homes, burned churches, and killed and enslaved people they captured. All Europe feared the Vikings. In their churches, the people prayed, “From the fury of the Norsemen, Good Lord, deliver us!”

The Danes

The Danes were among those Vikings who raided western and southern Europe. One group invaded England and set up settlements there in the Danelaw. Their right to rule this area had been recognized by Alfred the Great. In 954, an heir of Alfred the Great forced the Danes to leave. In 978, Ethelred (eth’ uhl red), nicknamed the Unready, became king of England. The Danes saw their chance and began raiding England again. At first, Ethelred was able to buy them off with silver. In 1016, however, a Danish king called Knut, or Canute (kuhn noot’), conquered England and made it part of his North Sea Empire. Canute was a powerful and just ruler. He converted to Christianity and brought peace and prosperity to England. Soon after his death in 1035, however, Danish control of the country came to an end. Some Danes left England. Those who remained became a part of the English people and culture.

Another group of Danes tried to take the city of Paris in France, but the French managed to fight them off. In 885, the Danes tried again. The people of Paris held them off for ten months. Finally, the French king paid the Danes gold to abandon their attack.

Led by a warrior named Rollo (rah’ lo), the Danes began settling along the French coast opposite England. In 911, the French king signed a treaty with Rollo. He gave the Danes this land. In return, the Danes became Christians and promised to be loyal to the French king. The region in which the Danes settled became known first as the Normandy (nahr’ muhnd) and then as Normandy (nohr’ muhnd). The people became known as Normans.